"Students today need a stronger link between education and employment so they can build successful careers and thrive in a highly competitive job market," said Jeff Gerkin, Right Management's senior vice president North America sales. "Right Management and Webster University are committed to giving students the much needed advantage of learning how to own and drive their careers upon graduation and throughout their working lives."

Webster University's Career Management and Coaching Program will be offered in partnership with Right Management. The program will include a required course entitled "Career Success for the 21st Century," which will provide students with a foundation in career management and cover such topics as self-assessments, personal branding and social media. As part of the course, students will connect with a Right Management career coach who will provide career guidance.

After completing this required course, students have the opportunity to receive personalized career development services through Right Management, including one-on-one career coaching to help with resume writing, interviewing skills and developing a career action plan. Students will then have access to ongoing career development support over the course of their careers through lifetime access to Right Management's career resources, including its alumni network and job bank.

"This partnership with Right Management gives Webster University students an innovative opportunity to proactively manage their careers and achieve their goals," said Benjamin Akande, dean of the Walker School. "Webster University recognizes that today's changing workplace is requiring students to have not only the necessary skills and education for a career, but also the career-ready skills needed to be successful at work."

More than 11,000 students are enrolled in graduate business, management and computer science programs at the Walker

School. These degree programs are offered at Webster University across the U.S., Europe, Africa and Asia and delivered online.
